Gardening is back! The long winter withdrawal, all that horticultural emotion pent up for so long, combines with the sun to drive people outdoors, usually into the cold air and often into strange entanglements with borders and beds. Anyone who has a garden (or even only a window box) will know what Susanne Wiborg is talking about: nimble nuthatches and rare frogs, the scent of lilac and sweet woodruff, irresistible columbine and irrepressible courgette. And a moribund apple tree which taught her an important lesson: that your garden is fortunately the most reasonable place to fulfil your wildest dreams. Entertaining and ever informative, Susanne Wiborgs regular column in the Zeit has earned her a faithful readership who value her passion and knowledge and simply enjoy reading about her garden adventures and how she learned to prize even the privet.

Susanne Wiborg

Susanne Wiborg was born in 1957. She studied history and is now a freelance journalist, writing for DIE ZEIT and other publications. Though fascinated by history – especially Hanseatic history – she no longer wished to engage professionally with the Third Reich. Why keep plumbing depths which can never truly be understood? Susanne Wiborg is a journalist based near Hamburg. She writes for Die Zeit and kraut und rüben. Her first garden book (Blütenpracht und schlaue Hühner) was published by Kunstmann in 2016.
