Kurt and Jens are 26 years old and have thought it all through. Finally, they feel ready to face life's real challenge: women. Nothing much has happened on that score, but that has to change and now is the time. They leave their mothers and move to the city, where life is harder and faster. Kiel isn't exactly New York, but the apartment they share with Enno, the surfer, is a good place to start. And they come well equipped: Kurt knows a lot about feminism, Jens about the components of the 1976 Ford Taunus; Kurt's homeopath Frauke can offer advice about male and female energy flows and the use of Bach flowers and Rescue Remedies. But where are all the women and what signals are they sending out? What do they want to talk about and why do they always end up going home with someone else? A small-town neurotic is at work here, a deft commentator, the likes of which we haven't heard in a long time.
